

Cena and Punk's Segment Last Night.

Last night when I was writing the review I was thinking about Lawler and not really focused on the promo and I thought I'd talk about it a bit more here. I thought the promo was excellent and it really sold the story they're telling. The idea of Punk being delusional about his greatness and having the issue of respect going to his head and beyond is a classic but in Punk's case his reign is starting to back it up. Having Bret, one of the guys that Punk was so sure he was leaps and bounds ahead of take the champ down with a single punch was great as it woke Punk up and brought him somewhat back to reality. You could see it in his eyes at the end of the night that he had gotten a wakeup call and that he could see the potential of what could happen to him on Sunday.

Also you have Cena who is his usual self and great in the big match promo. People criticize him for being too perfect, but that's the way his character is. I really don't get the idea of him being untouchable as he's lost over and over throughout the last few years, including losing clean in the biggest match of his life. I can kind of understand the idea of people not being happy that the loss just bounced off of him, but that's how Cena works: he wants to be in WWE and do his thing no matter if he wins or loses. He takes everything in stride and realizes that tomorrow is a new day and a new chance to win. He's very optimistic and he doesn't dwell on his losses. That's his character and I don't get why people hate it so much.

Overall it's a great promo and it makes me want to see their fight on Sunday even more.