The Rock vs. John Cena II…..Anybody?

This seems to be the general consensus about the match that is about as obvious as you could ask it to be. So at the Rumble, Cena won the right to fight for a world title at Wrestlemania. As luck would have it, Rock won the WWE Title and will likely be defending it at Wrestlemania. If you're too dense to figure it out at this point, it's pretty clear that Rock vs. Cena II is happening in New York at Wrestlemania 29. However, every opinion I've read of it since then seems to be the same: people aren't that thrilled with the prospect.

That's about where I am on it too. Now don't get me wrong: the match is going to be solid as these two can, no joke intended, bring it. The problem isn't having the match be good. It's having the match feel huge. Rock and Cena had a year to set up the previous match and by the end of it, I had to see it. I didn't care what happened or how good it was but I needed to see the match. With two and a half months to go and nothing new other than the title being on the line, I don't see how this is going to come off as something nearly as huge as last year.

Do I want to see it? Eh…..yeah I guess. If nothing else the promo work will be amazing as always. However, that comes back to the same problem: we heard these two talk about each other over the course of 14 months already. Basically this coming Wrestlemania feels like reheating the feast we had last year: it's still good but it doesn't taste like it did straight out of the oven.

Is anyone fired up at this idea?
