

Thought of the Day: The Lesson From HHH vs. Great Khali

I'm finishing off Brock vs. HHH and this occurred to me. Back in 2008, the Smackdown title match at Summerslam was HHH defending against the Great Khali. The idea of the match was simple: the only thing HHH had that could keep Khali down was the Pedigree so it was all he went for. He finally hit his home run move and Khali DIDN'T GET UP. Here's what popped into my head: how long has it been in a WWE PPV main event that it took one finisher to beat someone? It was a running joke in Rock vs. Cena and it's an annoying problem. Based on the logic of you can hit however many finishers you want, right hands could be considered a finisher as if you hit enough of them you'll win a match.

HHH vs. Khali is shockingly good too. Check it out.
