

Tough Enough Debuted Tonight

And I won't be watching it. The show started at 8 and I didn't remember it until about 8:30. By 8:30:05, it was clear to me that I didn't care about the show. Why would I want to spend months watching people compete to become a lower midcarder who isn't likely to ever accomplish anything in WWE? If this was a bunch of people who had extensive training and experience in wrestling (think the Ultimate Fighter), I'd be all over it. However, when you consider one winner ever has accomplished anything significant in WWE (John Morrison, though Matt Cappotelli could have done something had it not been for his illness), it feels like a big waste of time.

Now, back to SuperBrawl 2000.
