

Checked Out Becky Lynch's Chronicle And Edge And Christian's Show Totally Reeks Of Awesome

Since they keep putting out more and more stuff almost every single day.

First up was the newest Chronicle, with a shorter form version on Becky Lynch. This could have been any mini documentary as it only runs about twenty five minutes and covers a three week period. It made a lot of sense to do something like this as Becky is the hottest thing in wrestling at the moment and is going to be a big deal going forward. The special serves as a way to talk about Becky's backstory and her transformation into the Man, including how many things she's gotten to do since. You don't need to see something like this but for a quick watch, it's not bad.

Then you have the real treat with the second season of the Edge and Christian Show. I've praised this show a lot over the first season and this is no exception. It's basically a wrestling geek's dream show with all kinds of inside references (like Edge rapping about being ready to survive on the mean streets of Greenwich (after being coached by Pete Gas of course) with the line of "I've got more sweater vests than Sunny has court dates.") and cameos.

The best part of every show is the Chumpstain Challenge, the season long trivia competition with Edge and Christian competing where you can play against them (I smoked them on Survivor Series teams) in a heck of a competitive series. There's too much good stuff on this show to talk about and it's more than worth seeing. Just watch this and enjoy being a wrestling geek, because it's as good as it gets for something like this.
