Well that certainly would be big, but they better have the perfect opponent for him. Even if it's Hulk Hogan, I really don't want to see him out there at 62, unless it's in a tag match or something where he can come in, do his big spots and let someone else do the ending.

Smackdown Moving To USA In January 2016

That's quite the upgrade for them. It's also a good sign for WWE as NBC wants another show on a bigger network. SyFy never fit for a wrestling show anyway.

WWE Wants Stephanie McMahon vs. Ronda Rousey At Wrestlemania XXXII

This would be...different. I think you can see the major issue here: without a small army helping her, Stephanie would be lucky to last ten seconds in there from bell to bell. I know that sounds like a cliché, but the top competition the UFC can get for Rousey barely makes it fifteen seconds.

Now I know this is wrestling and Stephanie would cheat like there was no tomorrow and would probably have Rousey next to dead before she went after her, but this is pushing the boundaries of reality a bit too far for me. Stephanie can work a good match for a Diva, but if they're really going to try and sell this as Rousey is out of her element, they're in for a long night. Fans aren't going to buy Stephanie as any sort of a favorite in a match <http://onhealthy.net/product-category/womens-health/> where you can win by submission and have the match on a flat surface, and we know Rousey can strike as well. I'd be against the idea, but there's a slight chance it could be done right.

By right, I of course mean Rousey snapping Stephanie's arm in about 19 different places and Stephanie taking a long hiatus from TV, not showing up the next night and yelling. Or holding her arm to her side one segment and waving it over her head the next time she's on screen. That would just be dumb. Like, as dumb as emasculating Sting and raving about how she and Andre the Giant were friends and how it would disrespect Andre's legacy to have one of the biggest stars of all time in a match dedicated to Andre's memory. We're talking that level of dumb.
